I am going away, answered Virginia. As soon as I had finished this letter I was coming to ask you if you would please cash the check Cousin Tom gave me yesterday for my Christmas gift. If you could I would not have to go to the bank. I shall need it for my railroad fare. May I inquire where you are going said Mrs. Matthews. Only as far as Alexandria to visit my greataunt there. She has often asked me to come. Very well, answered her cousin, I will have Tom take you down himself. I do not think the journey will be too much for him. It will be only a few hours. Until now Virginia had maintained her selfcontrol, but her cousins willingness to let her have her own way was so unexpected that her fortitude gave way and she began to weep. Have you had your breakfast asked Portia. She was answered by a nod. Then stop crying. You have been ridiculous enough already without adding tears. And to be perfectly frank with you, my dear, I would rather see you kiss another young man than go into a fit of hysterics. I didnt kiss him. He kissed me! cried Virginia. Its tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum between the two, retorted Portia. I have just had a call from Mr. La Cerf. He was quite as absurd as you are, but I lavished upon him my only talent, good common...
