Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: .point by putting the great emphasis now-a-days upon methods? Is not the real question, not how shall we teach, but how much shall we teach? If the average pupil has only time allowed him to acquire the elements of the three R s, have we not erred in crowding them aside by enriching the curriculum with nature study and other new applicants for favor? Has not Dr. Harris rightly interpreted the needs of civilization in his restoration of reading, writing, and arithmetic to the leading place in the course of study? 1 These fundamental questions depend so largely upon the actual amount of schooling that we can count upon in the case of the average child, that much effort would be justified in attempting to determine the latter. There is probably nowhere in educational literature a scientific demonstration of the number that drop permanently out of...
