Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: .These schools occupy only a very limited field and do not cover any of the highly skilled trades. Even if they adequately met the needs of the employments for which they prepare the tuition they charge for very brief courses is prohibitive for most persons. At a later point in this report there will be a discussion of the effort that is now being made by the Girls Vocational High School to give girls two years practical and technical training and to place them as advanced apprentices in the trades, dressmaking, millinery, garment making, salesmanship, and junior nursing. So likewise the effort of the Dunwoody Institute to train boys in a two years course and place them as advanced apprentices in the trades of electrical working, telephony, carpentry, cabinet making, machine shop and automobile repairing and construction, will be discussed. The number of apprentices in the...
